

Not Quite Right News by Mark Lee Golden

Copyright 2014 Mark Lee Golden markleegoldenwriter.com

Malaysian Flight 370 to Extend Bermuda Triangle

Hamilton, Bermuda

That's what is being hotly debated in Bermuda's capital of Hamilton. The unofficial organization of Triangulars, who police the myths, legends and facts of the Devil's Triangle, is meeting to decide the inclusion of Malaysian Flight 370. The amazing, yet tragic mystery of Flight 370 has dominated international media since mid-March. Most conspiracy theorists have felt compelled to add this "missing" aircraft to the odd and lengthy list which makes up the Bermuda Triangle's victims. 239 passengers from 14 nations have now joined hundreds from decades past in a close encounter of an unknown kind.

Within the Triangulars, this fringe community of paranormal hobbyists and chasers of the supernatural, a severe dispute has arisen. To add Flight 370 to the canon of the lost creates another issue - being the distance from the famed, notorious Triangle. The closest the vast international search came to the Bermuda Triangle was some 12,000 miles or 19,000 kilometers. Flight 370 left Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, bound for Beijing, China, a far cry from Boca Raton or the Atlantic Ocean.

Some argue that the traditional coordinates of Bermuda, Florida and Puerto Rico create a tidy equilateral triangle and that the proposed inclusion creates an obtuse Isosceles triangle. "A real stretch!" is how one member put it. Another fumed, "The Obtuse Bermuda Isosceles Triangle? Preposterous!"

Others fear that this would open the gates to past and future incidents of lost and never-found crafts or persons. In support of this theory a map was provided.

Opposition stated the obvious, "It's not a triangle anymore! Look at it. That's a starburst! Who wants to be called a Starburster or Starular?" Apparently, many. The Triangulars are sparring sharp points with their fringe-nik brothers and sisters over this radical proposition. A final vote is due later this week. The Devil's fingers may indeed have sharp nails and reach from just off Miami's beautiful shores to the dark watery unknown of the Indian Ocean.

